9. Outcomes of the course, and methods of teaching, learning, and assessment.

Outcomes of the course:

A - Cognitive Aspect: This involves recalling information, perceiving it, and developing mental abilities and skills. This aspect is the most important for many test development processes, through equipping the student with the fundamental skills of the English language based on an advanced scientific curriculum from Oxford University. This enables them to access sources directly and handle academic materials from their original sources without the need for translation into Arabic.

B - Skill-based Aspect: The student should achieve the ability to understand English speakers well and improve their ability to interact with them to a level that qualifies them to move to the next higher level of learning English.

C - Affective Aspect: This involves the development of attention, reception, response, evaluation of things and phenomena, and the organization of mutual relationships between values. For example, the student's ability to organize a seminar and effectively present what they have learned in English.

Teaching and Learning Methods:

- 1- Lectures, benefiting from the internet, and using modern presentation and communication tools.
- 2- Brainstorming.
